

Bryn Mawr College

Scholarship, Research, and Creative Work at Bryn Mawr College

Graduate School of Social Work and Social
Research Faculty Research and Scholarship

Graduate School of Social Work and Social Research

2020

"The utmost strength I can bear": Strategies and psychological costs of mothering within political violence

Cindy A. Sousa

Mona el-Zuhairi

Manahil Siddiqi

Follow this and additional works at: https://repository.brynmawr.edu/gsswsr_pubs

Part of the Social Work Commons

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

This paper is posted at Scholarship, Research, and Creative Work at Bryn Mawr College.
https://repository.brynmawr.edu/gsswsr_pubs/90

For more information, please contact repository@brynmawr.edu.

“The Utmost Strength I Can Bear”: Strategies and Psychological Costs of Mothering within Political Violence

Cindy Sousa, Bryn Mawr College, Graduate School of Social Work and Social Research,
United States

Mona el-Zuhairi, Birzeit University, Community Psychology, Palestine

Manahil Siddiqi, University of Washington, School of Public Health, United States

Abstract

Though certainly not women’s only identity or set of responsibilities for women in conflict settings, political violence creates distinct challenges for mothers due to the additional burdens of care-taking in these contexts. Yet, given the paucity of research on the topic, we still are operating without a clear understanding of how political violence jeopardizes maternal well-being and care-taking practices. Drawing on feminist perspectives on mothering, in the analyses presented here, authors use content analysis to explore mothering and political violence from five focus groups with women in Palestine. Results demonstrate the considerable suffering mothers and children endure in war; the work mothers do to promote children’s well-being in this context; and how these efforts exhaust the psychological resources of mothers. Findings enhance a relatively small body of knowledge about the lived experiences of mothers within conflict settings, and point to the importance of tending to the strategies and needs of mothers who navigate political violence with and for their children.

Key Words

mothering, political violence/war, trauma, resilience, Palestine, parenting

Corresponding author

Cindy Sousa, PhD, MSW, MPH, Bryn Mawr College Graduate School of Social Work and Social Research, 300 Airdale Road, Bryn Mawr, PA 19010-1697;
csousa@brynmawr.edu.

Women provide the majority of care for the 3.5 million children around the world who live in settings of political violence, and they typically do so with severely compromised social and logistical support (Al Gasseer, Dresden, Keeney, & Warren, 2004; UNRISD [United Nations Research Institute for Social Development], 2005). Yet, as important as mothering is within political violence, there is little on the ground exploration of this responsibility. We therefore are operating without clear understandings of how war and conflict jeopardize care-taking practices; how threats to the maternal role due to political violence influence mothers' mental health; or how mothers persist in these contexts.

The small body of literature that does exist brings to light the helplessness and despair mothers face as they are rendered unable to adequately protect or provide for their children (Takševa & Sgoutas, 2015). Studies of women in Afghanistan, Bosnia, Palestine, and Central and South America illustrate the amplified pressure mothers endure within political violence to provide for and protect children, and the guilt and grief mothers experience when they are not able to do so (Punamäki, 1987; Robertson & Duckett, 2007; Roth, 2015; Shalhoub-Kevorkian, 2003). A few studies also reveal how mothers confronting ongoing violence and oppression mobilize incredible warmth, strength, and resourcefulness to promote their children's physical and emotional survival (Ajduković, 1996; Pavlish, 2005) - a process that has been termed parental resilience (Gavidia-Payne, 2015).

As this growing body of literature demonstrates, conceptualizing the complex experience and psychological toll of motherhood in settings of constant danger requires attending to mothers' own articulations of struggle and resilience in their quotidian practices—what Scheper-Hughes (1993, p. 341) terms “the pragmatics” of mothering. Exploring the ongoing work and psychological ramifications of mothering within political violence demands we take seriously the experiences, identities, and subjecthood of mothers (Ross, 1995; Takševa & Sgoutas, 2015). Addressing the need to add to the small body of scholarship that explores motherhood within conflict settings, in the analyses presented here we used qualitative data from a series of focus groups with women in Palestine that we analyzed and explored within a critical feminist theoretical framework.

Geo-political context of mothering in Palestine

The ongoing political violence in the Palestinian context must be understood through a larger settler-colonial framework, characterized by Israel imposing systems of dispossession and control (Salamanca, 2012). This is done by the spatial constraint of Palestinian people and places via land takeovers, home invasions, and a series of Israeli-only roads and checkpoints that take up upwards of 40% of Palestinian land in the West Bank (Hammami, 2015; United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs [UN-OCHA], 2007; Weizman, 2007); arbitrary and politically motivated arrests, detainments, and imprisonment (Giacaman & Johnson, 2013; McNeely et al., 2015); ongoing economic, educational, and social de-development (Barber et al., 2014; Roy, 2016); and humiliation and control (Giacaman, 2018; Sousa, Kemp, & El-Zuhairi, 2019).

Research on women’s psychological experience in Palestine suggests that for women in this context, motherhood appears to be central to (though certainly not the only factor within) relationships among political violence, trauma, and resilience (Giacaman & Johnson, 2013; Peteet, 1997; Shalhoub-Kevorkian, 2006; Veronese, Cavazzoni, Russo, & Sousa, 2019). Qualitative studies have found that mothering in Palestine generates ongoing guilt, fear, and hopelessness due to the impossibility of protecting children from the trauma and humiliation of political violence—while also providing an amplified sense of purpose and meaning for women (Akesson, 2015; Punamäki, 1987; Roth, 2015; Shalhoub-Kevorkian, 2003). As this body of literature illustrates, to account for the multiple nuanced points regarding the experience of motherhood in conflict settings, we must move beyond simply asserting the importance of maternal care to more deeply explore the logistical constraints placed on maternal power within these settings, and the emotional ramifications of this process. This requires the use of critical feminist theories about motherhood, which we review below.

Theoretical overview

Explorations of the psychological experience of mothering typically rest on theories about the significance of the maternal-child bond for healthy child development, many developed by psychologists who spent their formative years treating traumatized children in the wake of World War II, including Freud and Burlingham (1943), Winnicott (1992), and Bowlby (1969). Yet, these theories do little to help us broaden our understanding of the practical and emotional experiences of mothers, particularly within adversity, including war. To more deeply elucidate the actualities of women's lived experience of this role, we must move beyond generalized claims about motherhood through centering feminist theoretical frameworks.

Pointing to the intensive work mothering requires, in the early 1990s, Ruddick (1995) proposed that the protection, nurturance, and training of children requires consistent emotional and mental attention and complex, unremitting practices and sets of thinking by mothers. At this same time, Collins (1994) deepened theories about mothering by proposing that in African American communities, mothers must constantly attend to fostering individual and collective identity and physical survival in their children, which requires regular negotiations around power structures. Indeed, analyses of mothering cannot be decoupled from understanding the contexts of power surrounding motherhood, as the meanings and functions of motherhood depend on the social and political contexts of mothers, and reflect constraints related to power and inequality (Arendell, 2000; Rich, 1976; Roberts, 1993; Rodriguez, 2016).

This growing body of critical feminist scholarship about motherhood points to several important areas of examination regarding women's well-being and identity as tied to motherhood within oppressive circumstances. First, we must consider the logistical and psychological challenges of promoting children's individual and collective identity and assuring children of their place in the world, when their world seems to be fundamentally hostile and opposed not only to the survival of the individual child, but also to the collective survival of their entire community or people (Collins, 1994; Davis, 2016; Scheper-Hughes, 1993). Through our analysis, we sought to uncover these challenges. Second, associated with the task of exploring these challenges, in the research presented here, we aimed to bring to light the particular ways women in our study articulated the grief and loss – and also the resilience, power, and agency– that characterizes mothering within violent circumstances (Rodriguez, 2016; Tully, 1995).

Uncovering the realities of motherhood within conflict settings is only possible through soliciting and analyzing women's own narratives of their experiences, as scholars from within Palestine have argued (Giacaman & Johnson, 2013; Shalhoub-Kevorkian, 2003) and we have sought to do here. As we prioritized an analysis of women's subjecthood as mothers, we also strove for a mindful balance, wherein we neither reduced all of Palestinian women's experiences and actions to the role of mother, nor participated in ignoring or silencing women's identity as mothers as a crucial part of their lived reality and psychological experience within political violence (Al Labadi, 2003; Allen, 2009; Pasternak, 2010).

Methods

The analyses presented here are situated in a larger collaborative cross-cultural research project which sought to explore the health consequences of the conflict and ongoing occupation for Palestinian women. The organizational study partner was the Palestinian Medical Relief Society (PMRS), one of the oldest and largest Palestinian-based healthcare non-governmental organizations. Team members included the lead researcher and first author, an American woman with no training in Arabic language who spent over 10 months in the West Bank doing field work (CS) and a Palestinian woman from the West Bank who was a community psychology student who led the focus groups, did initial translations, and analyzed the data alongside the lead researcher (ME-Z). We worked with another Palestinian woman who helped arrange logistics, took notes during focus groups, and consulted on the process.

All procedures were approved by the University of Washington's Human Subjects Division. Data collection began in the West Bank using an ethnographic approach over three trips (in 2007, 2008, and 2009). This amounted to several months of participant observation conducted within these trips, as the lead researcher lived, shopped, and visited in local villages; did ride-alongs throughout the West Bank with healthcare workers and mobile clinics; shadowed mental health program supervisors and staff in their groups, site visits, and meetings; attended weddings and holiday celebrations; and informally interviewed a range of PMRS staff members. The lead researcher kept field notes via text and photographs throughout this time, documenting the lived realities of the occupation of the West Bank.

Field notes reflected not only external observations, but internal ones wherein she engaged in critical reflexive analysis of her outsider positionality and ethical engagement in the politics and practices of research as solidarity. Her own reflection upon the participant observation, as well as team discussions regarding the process, was an ongoing opportunity for the researchers to interrogate their own varied positionalities. For the lead researcher, the process drew into sharp relief her role as a transient outsider, endowed with the power and privilege based on her race, citizenship, class, and professional status, to come and go, both physically and emotionally. These dynamics highlighted the settler-colonial realities of the study site and process, and associated research dilemmas related to the imbrication of Orientalism and Western feminism within the colonial project (Barakat, 2018; Mohanty, 1988; Said, 1978). Responding to the dilemmas herein, we aimed to foreground the voices and knowledge of the Palestinian research partners and participants. Critical field notes and conversations among research partners buttressed the collaborative nature of the partnership, as did our process of commitment to eliciting the historical and material realities and specificities of women's subjective experiences. In line with this second task, on the second trip by the lead researcher, we conducted five focus groups in Arabic in 2008 with adult Palestinian women.

The choice of focus groups was consistent with the mandate to engage in what Palestinian scholar Shalhoub-Kevorkian (2003, 2009) terms the “ideology of the voice,” which uses practices of listening closely to the narratives of those most affected by political violence to gain a deeper understanding of the realities at hand. As such, the dialogic structure of focus groups is consistent with emancipatory and feminist traditions (Kamberelis & Dimitriadis, 2005; Madríz, 1998).

According to the agreement between the lead researcher and PMRS, the selection criteria for the focus groups were broad. All adult Palestinian women were eligible to participate. We sought a diversity of ages, representation of women from rural and urban sectors, and a range of educational levels. PMRS staff recruited focus group participants from their clinics, including general health and eye-care clinics and children’s programs. PMRS staff approached potential participants with a prepared script explaining the study and its potential benefits and risks. Women were informed that the study was strictly voluntary and their access to services would not be affected by their decision to take part. Procedures for the focus groups also included an oral consent process following a script.

The five observations included the following number of participants in each group: Al Khalil (Hebron) (5), Nablus (7), Jerusalem (4), Qalqiliya (10), Tulkarem (6). Our focus groups, which lasted about an hour, were co-facilitated by two Palestinian women. We asked women three broad questions: What are the experiences within political violence that they, their families and their communities face? How do these experiences affect the well-being of individuals, families and communities? How do individuals, families and communities mobilize resilience in efforts to endure political violence?

Women in the groups represented a large range of demographics. All women were older than 18; they ranged in age to 80. Women came from both rural and urban sectors in five distinct sectors of the West Bank. Other than this information from our pre-established selection criteria and sampling plan, we did not collect detailed individual demographics on the women in large part because of concerns related to the delicate nature of collecting data in this setting and our concerns for women's ease and confidence in the anonymity of the data, as women expressed fear about being identified. For example, in one focus group, once we explained that we were recording, all of the women got up and left the group and we had to re-recruit for that site.

Data were translated into English using a process in which the lead researcher compared two versions and deliberated with the Palestinian research team to establish a final translation—a technique that helped ensure fidelity of meaning across linguistic and cultural positionalities (Esposito, 2001; Temple, 2002). Since the focus group data were collected in 2008, through our collaborative research process we consulted not only about the translation of our data but also about the durability of our data over time. The year 2018 marked fifty years of Israeli occupation of the West Bank; by all accounts, the health and humanitarian crises caused by the Israeli policies and actions against Palestine have only worsened (Amnesty International, 2018; United Nations, 2018). Our Palestinian research partners and on-the-ground experts remain in the West Bank, including the co-author on this paper, who has worked as an accompaniment worker for over ten years. Their experiences corroborate the assessment that, unfortunately, the realities of the occupation have not changed in the past decade.

In the tradition of conventional and directed content analysis, we both applied and sought to further existing theories through our analysis (Hsieh & Shannon, 2005). In this sense, our approach to data collection and analysis reflected a balance of inductive and deductive approaches. During initial data collection, we consulted after each focus group to ascertain major themes and decide how to proceed. After all data collection was complete, the two researchers who were part of the original research team coded line by line, using coding that emerged from the data. Because of our commitments to investigating the daily experiences and emotional ramifications of living within political violence, they used in vivo coding and coding for processes, emotions, and consequences (Corbin & Strauss, 1990; Saldaña, 2016). These researchers used coding matrices to detailed codes, their definition, and examples, and to sort smaller codes into broader categories. The lead researcher then constructed network displays to align the codes, organize and further analyze results (Attride-Stirling, 2001).

Our initial broad network display illustrated poignant themes that required more specific levels of analysis. One such theme was that of motherhood, with sub-codes that connected psychological reactions to the experience of mothering within this context. The strength and emergent nature of the theme of motherhood pointed to the salience of this role for participants, and the imperative for us to examine this theme in its own right. The research team, comprised of the two initial researchers and one new researcher then embarked on a new process of developing, applying, and refining codes based on critical feminist theories of motherhood. As the coding process went on to its later stages, we relied on both our data and the critical feminist theories in which we immersed ourselves to develop our codes and themes and the various relationships among these, and used network displays to link our data to our theoretical concepts. In our final theoretical stage of coding, we constructed new network displays to sharpen our coding scheme, organize results, and align our analysis with the theories upon which we drew.

This final process of coding and analysis resulted in a conceptual model (Figure 1), based on a set of theoretically based codes. We used the analysis features of our analysis program, Dedoose, to generate statistics about the co-occurrence of themes and codes within the data (Dedoose, 2018). Coupling this analysis with our immersion in the quotes themselves assisted us in the discovering relationships between and the circular nature of subversion of maternal power and its reassertion, as well as how emotional suffering arises from this process.

Results

Our analysis resulted in a conceptual model that situates our major findings within the critical feminist theoretical literature on motherhood reviewed above to highlight the ways in which women grappled with three major concerns related their mothering in the Palestinian context: (1) protecting their children physically and emotionally; (2) providing for their children's logistical and material needs; and (3) promoting children's pride and sense of individual and collective identity. These emergent themes of protecting, providing, and promoting were informed by feminist theoretical notions motherhood laid out by Ruddick (1995): protection, nurturance, and training and those laid out by Collins (1994): ensuring physical survival and fostering pride and individual/collective identity against the backdrop of denigration.

 Figure 1 about here*

Collins (1994) also asserted that ongoing negotiations around power are central to motherhood and that within oppressive contexts, motherhood is a highly dialectical process wherein women constantly move between power and powerlessness. Reflecting this dynamic, our findings demonstrate how women continually experience and then respond to the subversion of maternal power as they reassert their agency and maternal role within considerable precarity. This ongoing dialectic is not without its emotional toll, however, and through our data, women's narratives made clear the psychological costs that mothering within political violence – which we describe as maternal suffering.

“May God protect you:” Subversion of maternal power within political violence

Constraints on Protecting. In one focus group, two mothers recounted the deaths of their older children. As other women witnessed and joined in telling these stories, groups demonstrated considerable grief, ascertainable via their tears and their verbal attempts at affirming other women's stories and feelings, expressing anger, frustration, and empathy. One woman described how she lost her son. She recounted that she went to work the morning of a day that Israelis entered the area. Then:

“The Israeli army entered the area and my son went out to see. The Israeli army started to hit the kids. The kids started throwing stones and running back.

Darkness fell, and no one knew he had been killed. But they saw either a bicycle or motorcycle that was his. The next day, everyone in the town was looking for him; they didn't know for sure that he had died.”

The mother went on to say that she had returned at 7:00 from work to ambulances and tanks in the area, particularly around a valley that was on fire, where they eventually found her son. The mother recounted that apparently he had tried to pull himself up alongside the valley wall before dying. She ended her story by stating “They left him to die. They did not help him.” Immediately following this story, another woman also shared about her son being killed at the hands of the Israelis:

“The IDF [Israeli Defense Forces] decided to demolish the factory. They surrounded it with tanks. They asked all the workers to get out but they did not wait. My son was still inside. They threw a bomb and a fire started. People started to scream. The IDF prevented any source of help. My son was not able to make it. My son burned to death. I had to go to identify the body. It was so hard; I will never forget it.”

One major setting where women focused their stories was their homes. They detailed Israeli soldiers entering their homes to search and intimidate people. One woman detailed:

“They knock on the door and enter like barbarians. [When they enter], we have to wake the kids at night. We’re so afraid they are going to take my husband. Sometimes they search us, and that is frightening. They attack us savagely.”

Women also talked about having to try to hide with children during active shooting. One woman, whose daughter was 3 years old, described to the group: “They entered our camp and-you remember when they threw rockets on us? – My daughter was so afraid and I was trying to hold her with my aunt, too. It almost hit her. Ever since then, my daughter is always afraid.” This mother continued to share that she had taken the daughter to the doctor, during one spell as often as four times a week. According to this mother, the doctor “gave her a lot of medicines but it didn’t help.” Another woman described that they regularly face violence even while they are in their home, as her house is close to an Israeli settlement and army installation: “My daughter and I one time was going up the stairs and she sat on the stairs because she heard shooting. We were sitting and hiding—we were so afraid—we had a feeling they were watching us.”

Women’s stories of their attempts at physical protection were closely tied with their attempts at psychological protection of their children; for instance, one woman said, “They came to the car and starting hitting. At that time there were rockets being thrown. I tried to calm her down, she was very upset and was crying.”

Constraints on providing. Women expressed increased pressure and desperation about making ends meet for their families, saying, for example:

“My husband used to own a restaurant before the occupation but now he doesn’t have anything. After the occupation, when the Intifada happened and all that, no one came to the restaurant, the whole place was burned, no one comes. We want just any income; we don’t have any income. I’m willing to do anything, but there’s nothing I can do.”

Another woman said, “I have kids 7, 8 and 10 and the economy creates a lot of suffering for them. I can’t afford the expenses for them. Before they constructed the wall, people used to go inside to work, but with this wall people are not able to continue their work.” Mothers also expressed grief about being unable to dole out treats, as the occasional provision of delights symbolized childhood and celebration for their families; one mother shared: “My little boy wanted something from me, and I could only give him a little something – that’s all I had.”

Women articulated being divested of the means to support even children’s nutritional well-being, as did this woman, who said, weeping, “I don’t have anything to cook, all I have to cook is lentils and rice. I don’t have any other food I can cook for the family. Well, that's our destiny, what shall we do? We just don't have enough food for our families." Another woman shared, "Sometimes even for a week, we cannot eat. We don't have anything. This is the important information to tell you. It's a miserable life."

Again and again, women pointed to how impediments to movement inherent in the occupation compromised women's abilities to provide their children healthcare and education. One woman shared:

"I have a sick little boy. I have had to take him to the Mukasad Hospital in Jerusalem since he was 10 months old, and now he's 4 years old. Before the Intifada he could enter Jerusalem to go to the doctor. Since the Intifada, they make it difficult for us enter with the checkpoints and the permits. It is always a problem and sometimes I have to go by myself because they don't give permission [for others to go with us]."

Women explained how Israeli checkpoints, violence, and threats accompanying the Israeli presence in their communities were responsible for relentless interruptions to children's education. A mother shared, "When the Israelis constructed the wall, it was difficult for my children to get to their exams, because the wall is in the same city where they have to take the exam. Is there any other nation that oppresses people to such a degree that they control them inside and outside?" One mother said that she had to accompany her children every day so that they could get to school safely, an experience which was met with agreement by others in the group. Another attributed interruptions to education directly to the experience of children being arrested: "So there are kids who are 14, 15, 16 and what did they do wrong that they cannot continue their education? They just keep capturing them; all we see is them capturing these children."

Constraints on promoting. Daily hassles and humiliation factor into the shared daily realities of women and children in Palestine, interrupting the abilities of mothers to promote a sense of dignity and structure for their children. For example, one mother shared that once she was being questioned to see if she was taking part in the resistance (Intifada), and she had to bring her baby with her when she went for questioning: “I had to go down and I had a baby with me because they wanted to investigate me - they wanted to inquire if I belonged to the Intifada. So we stayed for 5 hours. I was so afraid that day.”

Women described encounters they had with Israeli soldiers, in which they were frightened and demeaned alongside their children. One woman recounted going through checkpoints with her daughter and enduring humiliation as the Israeli soldiers taunt her and her daughter. They respond by pretending they didn’t understand Hebrew and trying to ignore them. Another woman in the group added she avoids checkpoints with her daughter, and instead has her husband accompany the daughter through them.

Mothers highlighted how impediments to movement undermined their power to promote children’s cultural and religious identities. Being prohibited from taking children to sacred sites represented a particular heartache for women, who in two separate focus groups, told stories about trying to bring children to the Dead Sea and the Dome of the Rock. One woman described bringing her children to the Dead Sea, saying that she would like to be able to bring her children to see the historical places of Palestine. She recounted that when they got there, they had to beg to be allowed to go in the water, which the Israelis only permitted for five minutes, all the while deriding the family. In the end, she said:

“You feel sad because you are in your own land and water. You look there and you see all these Israelis have their playgrounds, their kids are happy playing and so on, and we cannot do the same, even in our own water....”

Narratives illustrated how violence and oppression makes vulnerable the very concept and promise of childhood. One woman asserted, “Children no longer know the meaning of childhood because they can’t live as children.” Loss of the ability to just be a child was described as a loss of a right, as one woman articulated, “No one is considering the children and that they have the right to live.” Later in that same group, women highlighted the frustration they feel regarding their children’s loss of innocence: “We want to have a good life so we can let our kids live, because they have to live. Their lives are miserable. There is no life for them.”

Women talked about how children could not safely play outside and how, for their entire lives, “children don’t see anything but this kind of treatment and occupation.” As another woman put it, “They are born and live under the circumstances of the occupation, full of fears.” Descriptions of loss of childhood provoked mothers to reflect on their sense of powerless regarding protecting children’s innocence and hope: “It is sad for us because we don’t know what to tell our children about what the future holds.”

Maternal suffering within political violence: “I cry when I’m alone but I don’t cry in front of them”

Concluding her thoughts about her attempts to psychologically protect her young son, a woman simply ended by saying, “I can’t do more than encourage him. I can’t stop the fear that overtakes him.” One woman conveyed, “What affects you is when you see your son is captive or wounded and you can’t do anything for him.” Women’s narratives about powerlessness in terms of not being able to meet their children's basic requirements, particularly for education and healthcare, reflected considerable psychological pain, illustrated by one woman's testimony that "It's really hard to know that we cannot fulfill our children's needs," resulting in her feeling "inadequate, like I just cannot do anything."

As deeply as women seemed to feel a responsibility to be strong, they also were collectively clear about the emotional and physical toll exacted by constantly hiding their own anguish, evident in narratives like: "I cry when I'm alone but I don't cry in front of them." This demonstrable sense that mothers must be strong for their children was echoed by a woman in another group, "I would never cry in front of them; I want to show them strength." The sense of maternal exhaustion created by mothering within political violence was palpable in participant observations and plainly illustrated by a woman in one of our focus groups who said, "I have been strong and strong all the time, to the utmost strength I can bear."

Reassertion of maternal power

It was clear that mothers seemed to draw strength from their very role as mothers, and that they used culture and collective identity to build strength. For example, one focus group participant asserted, "As a mother, I have to keep on giving love and affection to my family, despite all the problems and difficulties we face." Mothers' internal fortitude laid the groundwork for the actual tactics they used to help their children, reasserting their work protecting children's physical and mental health; providing for them materially and logistically; and promoting children's integrity and sense of identity and pride.

Reasserting protecting. Women's narratives highlighted their attempts at protecting their children physically and emotionally. Describing her attempts to keep her son safe during demonstrations, one mother said:

“My son didn't do anything - he was caught walking in a demonstration. I don't like my kids to stay in the street and be in the demonstration. I used to pressure my kids, force them to not be in the demonstration, [but] as much as you try to prohibit children from going, he will go sometimes. There was a friend of ours and I told him to take care of my son-watch him.”

Women's narratives highlighted mothers' commitment to being emotionally responsive to their children in the hopes of alleviating the psychological ramifications of the violence they encounter. The task of reassurance is not an easy one. Mothers expressed that their children are afraid to go outside, afraid to be alone, afraid every time they see soldiers or hear shooting. For example, one woman explained, “every time she hears shooting, my daughter comes and screams and says ‘Mother, I'm afraid,’ and I tell her don't worry, don't be afraid of them—I encourage her and give her hope.” In one focus group, a woman said, “We like to support our kids, we like to be behind them.” This was echoed by everyone affirming this statement.

Reasserting providing. Women talked about their individual and community solutions to the poverty and lack of material goods they faced because of the siege. One woman reflected on the hard times of the first Intifada, saying: “During the Intifada, there was nothing; a person couldn't even get 5 shekels to live on. So the women were forced to raise chicken, sheep, go and get dandelions and other wild herbs to eat. This is the only way she can feed her kids.”

Another woman detailed efforts at community helping and cooperating, such as sharing goods like food and bread. As well, women talked about education as an individual and communal source of strength, and their efforts at trying to support their children's education:

“We have strong will, we will continue to follow this will, no matter what.

Children go to universities and finish if they can. Even if [a loved one] died as a martyr, that doesn't mean it's going to stop our life; our life will continue on. Yes, we face massive oppression and inhumanity, but we will continue our life.

Despite the difficulties, we will continue to move on.”

Reasserting promoting. Our analysis pointed to the ways that maternal encouragement and maternal resistance entwine, as revealed in one mother's account of her persistence in visiting her son who was in jail: “Once, during the Intifada, they forbid me from visiting my son who was in prison. I was at a border, and they stopped me and wouldn't let me in. I defied them by talking to him through the prison walls. I was calling Marwan, Marwan [my son]. My son came up to the wire fence and I kept running to see him. I told the Israeli forces, ‘I saw my son and that's all I wanted so do whatever you want.’ We need to be strong.” Another woman described the day the Israelis came to handcuff her son and take him to jail “I told them just one minute, I need to speak to him. I told him, God bless you, my son, and don't worry. May God be with you and may God protect you.”

In compelling conversations, women in the focus groups also described the complexities within their responsibility to help children make meaning of their own realities. In one group, the women excitedly disagreed with one another about how and what children should be exposed to about the conflict. In the midst of one mother talking about how children see aspects of the conflict on the news, another woman interrupted her to tell her that she thought that children should not be exposed to the news. “But they do see it,” the first woman countered, going on to explain that children ask her to explain why things are happening, after they see acts like a tank demolishing a house. Another woman went on to convey to the group: “When my daughter sees somebody wounded, with an eye or hand missing, and she comes and asks me and complains to me, I don’t know how to explain it to her sometimes. Sometimes if I see somebody like this wounded, I don’t have the heart to even look at this person. This is how I feel, so what do you expect from a child seeing these things?”

The contentious task of sense making was also captured later in this same interchange by a woman’s reflection; she said her children should have awareness of the situation, including “the blood and how they massacre us” because she wants them to identify with the Palestinian land and country:

“Sometimes I like my kids to see the martyr but sometimes I don’t. I like my kids to see what’s happening because I want them to still feel close to their land as Palestinians, because this is our country. That’s why I want them to see, because I want them to see the blood and see how they massacre us. When they get older, they will understand what the Israelis have done to us. If we don’t let them know what the situation is all about, then they will blame us that we are the terrorists, killing the Israelis-but we want them to understand.”

Narratives similarly unveiled deeply felt obligations to do the mental work of fostering children’s moral development, despite how the conflict violated individual and collective senses of justice. One woman expressed, “We try to teach our children not to take advantage of others and to be fair and tolerant, to love each other, that everyone should live together—even though we do not have this opportunity.” Women’s statements highlighted not only individual resolve, but also the articulated Palestinian histories of survival, which were very much collective in nature, as evident in this statement: “The children, and us, we have strong wills, we will persevere no matter what.”

Relatedly, our analyses revealed the ongoing obligation that mothers felt to maintain a sense of optimism in their children, in direct opposition to the realities that faced them. This was put simply by one woman who talked about how “we shouldn’t always frighten our children by telling them that the army’s here and they are going to shoot us,” admonishing the group, “we should not sow fear in the hearts of our kids.” She went on to say:

“We were forced to be occupied and we had to accept it now. But we must never fail to have faith in God. Life goes on and we have to take what it is. We should always give our kids hope that things will change. We should at least give them a hope of a future.”

Discussion

Women’s accounts highlighted both the anguish and the strength of mothers as they attend to complex mental and emotional tasks in their attempts to raise safe, moral, and culturally and historically conscious children within ongoing political violence. Our findings highlighted how hard women worked when physical and psychological violence surrounded their children, or when their children were arrested, to at least psychologically shield their children from pain. Mothers described holding their children, communicating with them openly, and offering what reassurance they could. Women's narratives also highlighted how much mothers worked within considerable structural violence to ensure the finances of their family and to provide opportunities for education and healthcare. The economic constraints associated with motherhood in Palestine that our participants highlighted reflect findings of other scholars, who have found economic precarity to be core to the suffering of parents and children in conflict settings (Akesson & Badawi, in press; Eggerman & Panter-Brick, 2010; Sim, 2018). Finally, mothers' insistence on promoting dignity, identity, pride, educational success, and joy for their children revealed the ways individual survival is inexorably linked to community survival. Mothers described the strain of both protecting children from realities of the conflict while also explaining the phenomena in such a way as to nurture their children's cultural and political identities and pride. Collins (1994) described this ongoing, complex responsibility undertaken by mothers as they help their children accept life as it is while also fighting against fatalism and disheartenment as visionary pragmatism.

The distress detailed by mothers in our study reflects other findings from Palestine that highlight the ongoing fear, tension, and hopelessness mothers encounter in this setting (Punamäki, Qouta, Miller, & El-Sarraj, 2011; Punamäki, 1987). This growing body of work illustrates how, despite their best attempts, mothers in dangerous settings often face the limits of their power to effectively shield children from the realities of the violence and oppression – with deep implications for maternal well-being. For instance, one qualitative study highlighted a mother's attempt at physically and psychologically protecting her children during a 5-day siege on their house through attempting to comfort them and helping them to divert attention on happy and safe memories and stories.

Nonetheless, the mother reported feeling extreme guilt about the lasting effects of this experience on her children (Punamaki et al., 2011). The emotional and cognitive experiences of mothering detailed by the women we worked with support the conclusions of other scholars who have identified the continual undermining of mothers' sense of competence within the political violence of Palestine; this maternal power often becomes quite difficult to reclaim, try as a mother might (Akesson, 2015).

Within the many limits imposed on their mothering by political violence, in the narratives we considered, mothers described how they modeled resistance and endurance for and with their children. They held and soothed their children and fought for their children's access to healthcare and education. They instructed their children to be fair and act with morality to others. They prepared their children psychologically for prison. The ways in which the women in our groups described reasserting their maternal power suggest the concept of resilience as applied to mothering in conflict settings might be understood in the same way that scholars are now understanding resilience more generally. That is, it is not the magnitude or any assurance of victory that matters, but rather varied and regular attempts at logistically and emotionally surviving challenging circumstances (Anderson & Danis, 2006). Relatedly, our set of findings about resistance and resilience add to scholarship from other qualitative and ethnographic research that highlights the ways in which the daily work of mothering in Palestine very much embodies ongoing defense of collective well-being and sovereignty (Peteet, 1997; Shalhoub-Kevorkian, 2016). As drawn out by women in our focus groups, our findings reinforce feminist theoretical notions about the dialectics of motherhood and power (Collins, 1990), as women's accounts underscore how mothering is not only a site of trauma and strife where women are divested of power, but also a site for a radical reassertion of power and individual-collective action, as Davis (2016) asserts.

It is important to note limitations of this study. First, we had a limited number of respondents and our recruitment was not random; therefore representativeness of the sample cannot be assumed. Second, while we are assured through our continued work in the region and consultation with expert reports that the realities described in our data remain highly relevant, it would be beneficial to have further studies done with more recently collected data. Finally, the emergent nature of the topic of mothering within conflict points to its salience as a theme; however, our focus groups did not specifically probe for this issue and motherhood was not a requirement for study participation. Had we anticipated this theme, our sampling frame and questions could have been tailored to uncover more information and greater depth related to the maternal experience. Relatedly, as the study was not aimed at the topic of motherhood at the outset, we did not collect data about the gender and ages of the children. Mothers confront distinct challenges and strategize their duties differently depending on various aspects of their children's identities and developmental stages; tailoring the research to the topic of motherhood from the beginning, and inviting more deliberate reflection about how mothering practices might differ according to gender or ages of children, as well as other factors such as the age and background of the mother, may have considerably deepened our data.

These limitations notwithstanding, in highlighting the everyday experiences mothers encounter within conflict settings, our results point to the importance of taking seriously the subjectivities of mothers as they navigate political violence with and for their children. We sought to uncover the subjective experiences of women as mothers within settings of political violence. To this end, here we drew out the ways in which motherhood entails anguish and strength, and requires regular and complex sets of thinking as women balance both survival and resistance. In so doing, this study affirms the importance of analyzing the psychological experiences of mothers within feminist theoretical perspectives that honor how the tasks and emotional experiences of mothering reflect ongoing dynamics of power and powerlessness within which mothers operate (Collins, 1994; Ruddick, 1995; Scheper-Hughes, 1993). Uncovering the practical and emotional realities of maternal power and powerlessness is particularly important in settings of protracted violence and oppression. Gathering and reflecting on mothers' subjective experiences, as we have done here, better equips us for policy and practice interventions that center the daily realities, strengths, and strategies of women who navigate political violence with and for their children (Murphy, Rodrigues, Costigan, & Annan, 2017; Peltonen & Punamäki, 2010).

Acknowledgements

We wish to acknowledge the Palestinian Medical Relief Society, particularly the drivers for their generosity of time and spirit and the staff at the clinics who welcomed us and carefully arranged for data collection. We also wish to thank the women who entrusted us with their experiences and narratives. You asked we carry and communicate your stories, and we hope we did so with care and integrity.

Funding Acknowledgement

This research was funded in part by support from NIMH Grant T32MH20010. The content is solely the responsibility of the authors and does not necessarily represent the official views of the National Institutes of Health. The funding source had no role in study design; collection, analysis and interpretation of data; writing of the article; or the decision to submit it for publication.

References

- Ajduković, M. (1996). Mothers' perception of their relationship with their children during displacement: A six month follow-up. Child Abuse Review, 5, 34-49.
- Akesson, B. (2015). Holding everything together: Palestinian mothers under occupation. In T. Takševa, & Sgoutas, A. (Ed.), Mothers under fire: Mothering in conflict areas. (pp. 40-56). Bradford, ON: Demeter Press.
- Akesson, B., & Badawi, D. (in press). "My heart feels chained": The effects of economic precarity on Syrian refugee parents living in Lebanon. In C. W. Greenbaum, M. M. Haj-Yahia, & C. Hamilton (Eds.), Handbook of political violence and children: Psychological effects, intervention and prevention policy. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Al Gasseer, N., Dresden, E., Keeney, G. B., & Warren, N. (2004). Status of women and infants in complex humanitarian emergencies. Journal of midwifery & women's health, 49, 7-13.
- Al Labadi, F. (2003). Palestinian women's emancipation and the uprising for independence. Resources for Feminist Research, 30, 121-133.
- Allen, L. A. (2009). Mothers of martyrs and suicide bombers: The gender of ethical discourse in the second Palestinian intifada. The Arab Studies Journal, 17, 32-61.
- Amnesty International. (2018). The state of the world's human rights. Retrieved from <https://www.amnesty.org/download/Documents/POL1067002018ENGLISH.PDF>
- Anderson, K. M., & Danis, F. S. (2006). Adult daughters of battered women resistance and resilience in the face of danger. Affilia, 21, 419-432.

- Arendell, T. (2000). Conceiving and investigating motherhood: The decade's scholarship. Journal of Marriage and Family, 62, 1192-1207.
- Attride-Stirling, J. (2001). Thematic networks: An analytic tool for qualitative research. Qualitative Research, 1, 385-405.
- Barakat, R. (2018). Writing/righting Palestine studies: settler colonialism, indigenous sovereignty and resisting the ghost (s) of history. Settler Colonial Studies, 8, 349-363.
- Barber, B., Spellings, C., McNeely, C., Page, P., Giacaman, R., Arafat, C., . . . Mallouh, M. (2014). Politics drives human functioning, dignity, and quality of life. Social Science and Medicine, 122, 90-102.
- Bowlby, J. (1969). Attachment and loss. Vol. 1: Attachment. London, UK: Hogarth Press.
- Collins, P. H. (1994). Shifting the center: Race, class, and feminist theorizing about motherhood. In E. N. Glenn, G. Chang, & L. R. Forcey (Eds.), Mothering: Ideology, experience, and agency (pp. 45-65). New York, NY: Routledge.
- Corbin, J. M., & Strauss, A. (1990). Grounded theory research: Procedures, canons, and evaluative criteria. Qualitative Sociology, 13, 3-21.
- Davis, D.A. (2016). "The Bone Collectors" Comments for Sorrow as Artifact: Black Radical Mothering in Times of Terror. Transforming Anthropology, 24, 8-16.
- Dedoose. (2018). Web application for managing, analyzing, and presenting qualitative and mixed method research data. Los Angeles, CA: SocioCultural Research Consultants, LLC. Retrieved from www.dedoose.com
- Eggerman, M., & Panter-Brick, C. (2010). Suffering, hope, and entrapment: Resilience and cultural values in Afghanistan. Social Science and Medicine, 71, 71-83.

- Esposito, N. (2001). From meaning to meaning: The influence of translation techniques on non-English focus group research. Qualitative Health Research, 11, 568-579.
- Freud, A., & Burlingham, D. T. (1943). War and children. New York, NY: Medical war books.
- Giacaman, R. (2018). Reframing Public Health in Wartime: From the Biomedical Model to the “Wounds Inside”. Journal of Palestine Studies, 47(2), 9-27.
- Giacaman, R., & Johnson, P. (2013). "Our Life is Prison": The Triple Captivity of Wives and Mothers of Palestinian Political Prisoners. Journal of Middle East Women's Studies, 9(3), 54-80.
- Hammami, R. (2015). On (Not) Suffering at the Checkpoint; Palestinian Narrative Strategies of Surviving Israel's Carceral Geography. borderlands, 14, 1-17.
- Hsieh, H. F., & Shannon, S. E. (2005). Three approaches to qualitative content analysis. Qualitative Health Research, 15, 1277-1288.
- Kamberelis, G., & Dimitriadis, G. (2005). Focus groups: Strategic articulations of pedagogy, politics, and inquiry. In N. K. Denzin & Y. S. Lincoln (Eds.), The SAGE handbook of qualitative research. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications.
- Madriz, E. I. (1998). Using focus groups with lower socioeconomic status Latina women. Qualitative Inquiry, 4, 114-128.
- McNeely, C., Barber, B., Spellings, C., Belli, R., Giacaman, R., Arafat, C., . . . Abu Mallouh, M. (2015). Political imprisonment and adult functioning: A life event history analysis of Palestinians. Journal of Traumatic Stress, 28, 223-231.
- Mohanty, C. (1988). Under Western eyes: Feminist scholarship and colonial discourses. Feminist review, 30, 61-88.

- Murphy, K. M., Rodrigues, K., Costigan, J., & Annan, J. (2017). Raising children in conflict: An integrative model of parenting in war. Peace and Conflict: Journal of Peace Psychology, 23, 46-57.
- Pasternak, C. (2010). Palestinian Versus Western Mothering: Reconsidering Dichotomies in Media Representation. Journal of the Motherhood Initiative for Research and Community Involvement, 1, 171-182.
- Pavlish, C. (2005). Action responses of Congolese refugee women. Journal of Nursing Scholarship, 37, 10-17.
- Peltonen, K., & Punamäki, R. L. (2010). Preventive interventions among children exposed to trauma of armed conflict: A literature review. Aggressive Behavior, 36, 95-116.
- Peteet, J. (1997). Icons and militants: Mothering in the danger zone. Signs, 23 103-129.
- Punamaki, R.-L., Qouta, S., Miller, T., & El-Sarraj, E. (2011). Who Are the Resilient Children in Conditions of Military Violence? Family- and Child-Related Factors in a Palestinian Community Sample. Peace and Conflict: Journal of Peace Psychology, 17, 389-416.
- Punamäki, R. L. (1987). Psychological stress of Palestinian mothers and their children in conditions of political violence. The Quarterly Newsletter of the Laboratory of Comparative Human Cognition, 9, 116-119.
- Rich, A. (1976). Of woman born: Motherhood as experience and institution. New York, NY: Norton.
- Roberts, D. E. (1993). Racism and Patriarchy in the Meaning of Motherhood. American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy & the Law, 1(1), 1-38.

- Robertson, C. L., & Duckett, L. (2007). Mothering during war and postwar in Bosnia. Journal of family nursing, 13, 461-483.
- Rodriguez, C. (2016). Mothering While Black: Feminist Thought on Maternal Loss, Mourning and Agency in the African Diaspora. Transforming Anthropology, 24, 61-69.
- Ross, E. (1995). New Thoughts on "The Oldest Vocation": Mothers and Motherhood in Recent Feminist Scholarship. Signs, 20, 397-413.
- Roth, J., & Duaibis, S. (2015). Crows on the cradles: Palestinian mothers at a frontline vortex, reflections on the psychology of occupation. International Journal of Applied Psychoanalytic Studies, 12, 5-20.
- Roy, S. (2016). Gaza Strip: The political economy of de-development (3rd ed.). Washington, D.C.: The Institute for Palestine Studies.
- Ruddick, S. (1995). Maternal thinking: Toward a politics of peace. Boston, MA: Beacon Press.
- Said, E. W. (1978). Orientalism. New York, NY: Pantheon Books.
- Salamanca, O. J., Qato, M., Rabie, K., & Samour, S. (2012). Past is present: Settler colonialism in Palestine. Settler Colonial Studies, 2, 1-8.
- Saldaña, J. (2016). The coding manual for qualitative researchers. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Scheper-Hughes, N. (1993). Death without weeping: The violence of everyday life in Brazil. Berkeley: University of California Press.

- Shalhoub-Kevorkian, N. (2003). Liberating voices: The political implications of Palestinian mothers narrating their loss. Women's Studies International Forum, 26, 391-407.
- Shalhoub-Kevorkian, N. (2006). Counter-Spaces as Resistance in Conflict Zones: Palestinian Women Recreating a Home. Journal of Feminist Family Therapy, 17(3-4), 109-141.
- Shalhoub-Kevorkian, N. (2009). The Political Economy of Children's Trauma: A Case Study of House Demolition in Palestine. Feminism & Psychology, 19, 335-342.
- Shalhoub-Kevorkian, N. (2016). Infiltrated Intimacies: The Case of Palestinian Returnees. Feminist Studies, 42, 166-193.
- Sim, A., Fazel, M., Bowes, L., & Gardner, F. (2018). Pathways linking war and displacement to parenting and child adjustment: A qualitative study with Syrian refugees in Lebanon. Social Science and Medicine, 200, 19-26.
- Sousa, C. A., Kemp, S. P., & El-Zuhairi, M. (2019). Place as a Social Determinant of Health: Narratives of Trauma and Homeland among Palestinian Women. The British Journal of Social Work, 49, 963-982.
- Takševa, T., & Sgoutas, A. (2015). Mothers under fire: Mothering in conflict areas. Bradford, ON: Demeter Press.
- Temple, B. (2002). Crossed Wires: Interpreters, Translators, and Bilingual Workers in Cross-Language Research. Qualitative Health Research, 12, 844-854.
- Tully, S. R. (1995). A painful purgatory: Grief and the Nicaraguan mothers of the disappeared. Social Science and Medicine, 40, 1597-1610.

- United Nations. (2018). Report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Palestinian territories occupied since 1967. Retrieved from https://www.un.org/unispal/wp-content/uploads/2018/03/A.HRC_.37.75.pdf
- United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs [UN-OCHA]. (2007). The humanitarian impact on Palestinians of Israeli settlements and other infrastructure in the West Bank. Retrieved from https://www.ochaopt.org/sites/default/files/ocharpt_update30july2007.pdf
- UNRISD [United Nations Research Institute for Social Development]. (2005). The Impacts of Conflict on Women. Geneva, Switzerland: UNRISD
- Veronese, G., Cavazzoni, F., Russo, S., & Sousa, C. (2019). Risk and protective factors among Palestinian women living in a context of prolonged armed conflict and political oppression. Journal of Interpersonal Violence. Advance online publication. doi:10.1177/0886260519865960
- Weizman, E. (2007). Hollow land: Israel's architecture of occupation. London, UK: Verso.
- Winnicott, D. W. (1992). The child, the family, and the outside world. New York, NY: Perseus Publishing.

Biographical Note

Cindy Sousa, worker, scholar, and mother of two young children, is an Associate Professor at the Graduate School of Social Work and Social Research at Bryn Mawr College. Her research focuses on trauma and resilience within families and communities. Cindy has developed particular emphases on the relationships between and effects of distinct types of violence; the lived experiences of parenting within adversity; the protective role of culture, place, and community; and professional responsibility in the face of collective suffering. She is working on several projects about the challenges, strengths, and strategies of families affected by war and the refugee experience.

Mona El-Zuhairi graduated from Birzeit University with a Masters in Community Psychology. Recently. She works as a Program Support Coordinator for Christian Peacemaker Teams, including working as a human right observer in Hebron mainly in the old city, and working in undoing oppression and internalized oppression, Moreover, Mona is an advocate for the rights of Palestinians, particularly children, under occupation. Mona has also worked as a counselor with mainly women and girls dealing with different layers of violence, including domestic violence.

Manahil Siddiqi is a global health specialist, with experience working with various international agencies including the World Health Organization, UNICEF, and UNAIDS. Manahil specializes in producing policy-relevant research and evidence tools to support governments, international development agencies and non-governmental organizations to implement evidence-based policy and programming. Her academic and professional work focuses on adolescent sexual and reproductive health; measurement, monitoring, and evaluation; and health and human rights in conflict. Manahil holds a Master's in Public Health with a specialization in Global Women, Adolescent, and Child Health from the University of Washington School of Public Health.

Conceptual model: The dialectic of mothering within political violence

