PLENARY PENDING

SGA will conduct a Plenary next Sunday, January 28th, to vote on the restructuring of the Assembly. Since the vote to lower quorum to 1/3 failed through lack of quorum, that vote will be held again this Wednesday.

The motion to lower quorum from two-thirds to 1/3, despite door-to-door polling at Bryn Mawr, because only 20 Bryn Mawr women living at Haverford were reached. The total vote then did not achieve the two-thirds quorum necessary to ratify the amendment. If it is ratified at the Wednesday dinner vote, the student body at Plenary will either reject or accept the plan for the restructured SGA.

In addition, Honor Board will raise at least two issues at the Plenary. One question will be discussion keeping. At present the Board keeps no records of the names of students who come before the Academic Honor Board. Concern over lack of records has been raised by the dean's office; for example, in the event that a person who has been involved in an academic case will be nominated to be nominated to the college for a national fellowship. Record-keeping might also aid the college if a student is excluded from the college for academic infractions ever sued, alleging denial of due process.

The Honor Board will offer several options for discussion, although it does not endorse any of them. The options include:

1. Keeping no records of names (the present system).
2. A file of descriptions of the case with the student's name attached, to be kept by the Honor Board head.
3. A file of cases with names could also be kept by the Undergraduate Dean, to be consulted only by the Dean and the Head of Honor Board.

A second proposal will concern the provision for appeal of social honor code cases. Presently, decisions of the Social Honor Board may be appealed to a board of the officers of SGA and the nine dorm presidents.

Some students are concerned that decisions made by the Honor Board, who are specifically elected to deal with social problems and ethical cases, and who decide by consensus, can be overridden by a group of people who were not elected to deal with such problems and who decide by majority vote.

Specific proposals for a new body for appeal will be contingent on the adoption or rejection of the proposed new constitution.

January Freshmen Arrive

Four freshmen have been admitted to Bryn Mawr in the January semester for the first time in the history of the college. Despite the fact that they will have to wait until next year to take Freshman English and begin year-long courses, Freshman Dean Jo-Ann Vanin "does not anticipate many problems."

The policy of admitting students as freshmen mid-year is still experimental. "We're starting slowly; we haven't opened the floodgates," said Vanin. Five freshmen were guaranteed mid-year places made available by students leaving for various reasons.

This situation was occasioned by the unusually high percentage of students actually enrolling from the number accepted. The entire waiting list was dropped but five promising students were accepted after the freshman class was full. They were given another chance, with the sanction of the dean's office. The five, who had all listed Bryn Mawr as their first choices, were offered places in January; four accepted.

Vanin admits that there are "some built-in problems." The four will finish mid-year 1983 and graduate that spring unless they go to summer school to make up the missing courses. It was left up to them to take courses the fall of this year or not.

Nicola Kenny decided to work and go to Yale part-time; Yale convinced her that she wanted to go to Bryn Mawr. "I kept thinking, "Bryn Mawr will be better - it can only be better." She had to choose between Oberlin in September and Bryn Mawr in January. Her mother, an Oberlin grad, urged her to come to Bryn Mawr.

Marla Albezquerque went to Goucher first semester and will graduate with the class of '82. Oddly enough, she also chose between Oberlin in September and Bryn Mawr in January. Noelle Harris worked and decided not to attend another school because of the difficulty of coordinating courses. She chose Bryn Mawr above a college she could enter in September because of its "individuality" - "This is what college should be like" - and because she felt she could get more support from a woman's college. The fourth freshman is Lovell Richardson, who was unavailable.

The freshmen will receive their lanterns next year at Lantern Night, and Vanin sees few difficulties in fitting in with class associations at Bryn Mawr. "It is, of course, early to judge," said Vanin, "we're going to see how it goes."
Alternate Grad Housing Discussed

Renovation of the Grad Center, houses on college property, and an apartment building on Montgomery Avenue were among the ideas to be considered in the problem of graduate student housing, as students met with Dean Bober to discuss the future of the Grad Center. The meeting with Dean Bober, Dean of the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, took place last semester after students protested the possible conversion of the Grad Center to undergrad housing.

As it is, students felt, the Grad Center is in such bad physical repair that it will be virtually unoccupied next year unless a number of problems are solved. "Undergraduates won't even want to live in it," one student pointed out, citing falling ceilings, flooding bathrooms and a number of other signs of decay. If the Grad Center is closed, however, students agreed that the College must offer some other type of housing to grad students.

Houses of college property was not a popular idea because of the dispersal of the already segmented grad community. The most well-received idea, also mentioned at President McPherson's meeting with the Grad Student Council earlier in December, was of taking over an apartment building, possibly one of those along Montgomery Avenue. This would be especially popular with married students.

Students felt the drawbacks to this idea were the fact that it was not on campus, lack of community through lack of common rooms, the lack of a dining hall, and the narrow range of people that might live there. Many foreign students, unable to obtain an apartment from overseas, would like in college housing, as well as those on financial aid who would have to live in college subsidised apartments. Other students would find it just as easy to get a non-college owned apartment. This would be influenced by the difference, if any, between college rent and non-college housing rent.

Though no decisions have been reached yet, the Graduate School is expected to reach a conclusion soon, to ensure that grad students will have college housing next year.

Speeches Open Semester

A statement of renewed dedication to the goals of a liberal arts education and the revealing of the donor of a million dollars to the college highlighted the opening Convocation speeches this semester. President Mary Patterson McPherson, Undergraduate College Acting Dean Mary Mprints Dunn, School of Social Work Dean Robert Mayer, Director of Libraries James Tanis and graduate student Louise DeWald opened Bryn Mawr's 186th semester last Monday, January 15th.

President McPherson announced several gifts to the college, including the donor of the million-dollar gift for the student center, Maureen Newberger and her husband. Much of the President's speech discussed the need for openness, cooperation and a spirit of tolerance.

Three future events of major importance to the college were announced by Director Tanis; Katherine Hepburn's narration of a documentary on M. Carey Thomas, the long awaited publication of Thomas Hardy's papers, and Bryn Mawr's English Professor Susan Dean's publication of some of Thomas Hardy's letters.

Deans Dunn and Mayer discussed the workings of their respective schools. Dunn commented on the changes in the dean's office and Mayer expressed hopes for his school of Social Work. Graduate student Louise DeWald marked in her speech on the birth of Martin Luther King and urged greater integration of the College staff.

The unfortunate death of Bernard Schwartz, husband of Trustee Rosalyn Schwartz, was also announced. Schwartz, a photographer and benefactor of the College, died December 31.

Externships Offered

Last spring sophomore Shari Leipzig did obstetrics at Harlem Hospital, junior Stacey Stowell taught high-schoolers in Connecticut, and Skye Brainard did props for a theatre group in New Jersey. The inspiration for all this creative endeavor was the Bryn Mawr externship program, being offered for the sixth year this spring.

Sixty sponsors are offering these unpaid externships to Bryn Mawr students this Spring Break. Basically an externship involves students joining their sponsors at their jobs, gaining practical experience and an insight into a career they might want to have. Sponsors are normally Bryn Mawr alumnae, their husbands, or parents of current or former Bryn Mawr students; housing is provided either by the sponsor or through the Bryn Mawr Alumnae Network. The externships are strictly volunteer, but can often lead to summer jobs.

Opportunities this year include work with an ABC-TV director, the Senior Editor of McCall's, the Director of the Manhattan Theatre Club, a geologist—lawyers, attorneys, doctors, art curators—even one involving medical computer science and making maple syrup! Qualifications may include specific training in the area but frequently only interest is required.

Those students interested in Externships should see Nancy Monnich in the Career Planning Office before February 7th. Appointments are recommended for all candidates. The placements will be announced the week of February 12th.
Faculty Gear for Show

Let it be feared that nine Februarys will pass without a single professor making a fool of him or herself on stage, rest assured that the faculty cannot--dare not--go that long without giving us a glimpse of that famed faculty roam. Yes, the Faculty Show will go on according to organizer and coordinator Mabel Lang. The snow, "Curricula Curricula," featuring singing, dancing, drama and costumes "after a fashion," is plotted to grace the stage of Goodhart Friday night, February 6.

"Curricula Curricula" has two acts, each consisting of skits separately prepared, as well as the well-received "Strange Interludes," by Neil O'Eugene (given by the Bryn Mawr Chapter of the Provincetown Players), which gained its reputation in the infamous Faculty Show of '67. Ascending into stardom in these entertainment will be such notables as Mary Pat McPherson, George Zimmerman, Gertrude Leighton and the indefatigable star of the interlude, Arthur Dudden.

Who else will take a stab at the immortal stage that night? "Everybody we can get in it is going to be in it," says Mabel Lang. She reports that all is going smoothly, though "the overall theme is still in the devising." The profits from the show will go toward the new campus building. Tickets, at $3.50 apiece will go on sale the week of February 12, in Goodhart from 2-2 daily. The faculty, it turns out, cannot even let February go by unimproved.

NETWORK LOCATES JOBS

Looking for a job in Washington, D.C.? In the summer of 1979, the Bryn Mawr College Career Network of Washington opened and placed twenty alumnae in jobs immediately.

The career network was the result of a questionnaire, sent to alumnae in the area, which tried to determine the amount of interest in such a network, and the alumnae's willingness to be a contact person in the network. The response was so overwhelmingly positive that they applied to the college for a grant and received a small one. It was enough to pay the salary for one coordinator and the rent on a small office. Ainslie McLees was appointed coordinator by the steering committee and worked ten to twelve hours per week during the fall.

In addition to helping with resources and with government EF 174 forms, the Career Network has a library of about 60 books, as well as a guide to Federal procedure for obtaining jobs. However, "by far the most valuable service offered by the Career Network in the service which places the Bryn Mawr service far above the other alumnae career centers, and which won for Bryn Mawr the kudos of the Alumni Association of Washington--the actual career net?"

NETWORK cont'd

The career network network started with 170 alumnae volunteering their services as contacts. These contacts agreed to talk to job hunters about their jobs and their fields, and to connect the job seeker with possible employers.

Since then, the network has mushroomed. Contacts in turn led to other contacts, and every job-hunter employed becomes in turn a new contact. The Career Network keeps a track of available jobs, and so many Alumnae are calling in with job openings that there are more open jobs than there are applicants to fill them.

Asked her opinion for its popularity, Ms. McLees said, "I think the network fulfills a need wonderfully. We are serving alumnae of all directions, the which they have in from recent graduates to women in their 50's coming back to the job market, as well as people returning to the job market after raising a family, and so on, who have been working since they left college, but are looking for another, better job."

Ms. McLees resigned in December. "Since then, the Career Network has moved to a new office and has two co-ordinators, Bonnie Holcomb and Susan Brown.

There are alumnae interested in a job in the Washington area, call for an appointment or stop by between 11:00 and 3:00 on Thursday. Ms. Holcomb suggests that you send them a resume and some idea of a field you are interested in before your appointment, to facilitate your job search.

PAYCARD CHANGE

The student payroll section of the Comptroller's Office has announced a change in procedure. Beginning with the Jan. 27 pay period, (pay date Feb. 16) student employees will no longer submit the paycards which they have in the payroll. Instead, each student will be given a group of pre-inked computer cards to use. These cards will already contain information that previously had to be filled in by the student each pay period. These computer cards will be available to the student in the Comptroller's office when paychecks are distributed on Feb. 2. With the new method, the student will only need to write the number of hours worked and the pay period, then have her employer sign the card.

This change to a computerized process will greatly simplify the payroll. Additional information is available in the Student Payroll Office.
Thursday Night at the Movies

The Spring Scheudule for the Bryn Mawr Film Series follows. All films, except during exam week, will be shown in the Physics Lecture Room. Exam week movies will be in the Biology Lecture Room.

FIlm Series Chairman Eileen O'Donnell and Ruth Clark are eager to hear comments, questions, or suggestions concerning this line-up or the Series in general.

His Girl Friday--Feb. 1, 7:00, 9:15. Rosalind Russell and Cary Grant trade oneliners and wisecracks in this fast-paced comedy about the not-so-scrupulous newspaper business. Howard Hawks directs. (1940.)

The Bandwaggon--Feb. 8, 7:00, 9:15. Fred Astaire and Cyd Charisse sing and dance their way through the production of a Broadway show. Vincente Minnelli directs. (1953.)

Harry V--Feb. 15, 7:00, 9:30. Lord Laurence Olivier directed and starred in this innovative, splendid film version of the Bard's play. Historical drama, indeed, film, at its finest. (British, 1945.)

Butley--Feb. 22, 7:00, 9:30. The playwright Harold Pinter directs Simon Gray's screenplay about a professor at an English university, facing middle age. Alan Bates stars. (British, 1973.)

A Song to Remember--March 1, 7:00, 9:15. Cornel Wilde as Frederic Chopin and Merle Oberon as writer George Sand. Jose Iturbi plays the Chopin score. Directed by Charles Vidor. (1945.)

Sympathy for the Devil--March 8, 7:00, 9:15. Jean-Luc Godard uses a rehearsal session of the Rolling Stones as basis for this arty film.

Stolen Kisses--March 22, 7:00, 9:00. Truffaut at his best. (French.)

The Man Between--March 29, 7:00, 9:00. James Mason in Berlin tries to outwit the Communists. Chilly g suspense drama. Directed by Carol Reed. (British, 1953.)

Caesar and Cleopatra--April 5, 7:00, 9:30. Shaw's comedy is brought to the screen in a lavish Gabriel Pascal production starring Claude Rains and Vivien Leigh. (British, 1945.)

The Ruling Class--April 12, 7:00, 9:45. Peter O'Toole is an eccentric heir to a fortune who thinks he is Jess Chast, much to his family's chagrin. (British, 1971.)

The Assassination Bureau--April 19, 7, 9:15. Diana Rigg and Oliver Reed in a comedy/adventure romp about a journalist investigating a series of unusual deaths. Great costumed fun. (British, 1969.)

The Apple War--April 26, 7:00, 9:15. This Swedish fantasy follows the efforts of a group of villagers who try, through supernatural means, to resist the advances of Big Business.

Mutiny on the Bounty--May 3, 7:00, 9:30. The classic seafaring tale starring Clark Gable as Mr. Christian andCharlton Heston as the despicable Captain Bligh. (1935.)

Exam Week Movies

The Man in the White Suit--May 8, 8:15, 10:15. Young Alec Guinness invents a miracle fabric that causes him nothing but trouble. Charming comedy. (British, 1951.)

A New Leaf--May 10, 8:15, 10:15. Wonderful movie about an heiress (Elaine May) pursued by a crafty fortune-hunter (Walter Matthau) who wants to marry her then do her in. Miss May also wrote and directed the film. (1973.)

The Philadelphia Story--May 11, 8:00, 10:15. Katharine Hepburn, Cary Grant, James Stewart. Required viewing for all Bryn Mawr students. (1940.)

coops proposed

In the wake of discussion about the new campus building, students have asked what options are available concerning a change in the dining hall plans. Several students, following this tack, have proposed a look into the co-op system, which has been tried successfully at a number of universities. Oberlin has one of the largest and most successful co-op systems, and so we called Oberlin to find out how their co-ops work.

One way is for a student body of around 3500, three dining options; co-ops, cafeterias, and family-style dining, with the result that the campus has a profusion of dining halls. There are between eight and ten co-ops, each with one hired adult co-ordinator and entirely staffed by student co-op members. All shopping, most foods are bought in bulk), meal planning, preparation, serving and cleaning are done by the students, who have to work one or two meals a week, depending on the size of the co-op. The cost is about $200 less per student per year than for the regular dining plan, for a co-op average member, of 4000. People who join the Oberlin co-ops, however, frequently do so for other reasons than the rice. Special diets are easily obtainable, since the meals are geared by the students to their particular wishes. In addition, many like the sense of fellowship; and co-ops are formed by a variety of groups-- there are co-ops for specific dorms, run by third world students, feminists, and contd on p. 7
Coed Haverford — Is Bryn Mawr Left Alone?

In the coming weeks SGA will be holding discussions and meetings on one of the most important issues affecting our future; what should Bryn Mawr do if Haverford—as seems almost inevitable—goes co-ed? Attendance at these discussions is strongly urged, since important issues are at stake in our future. What would News consider the options to be? The College News feels that Bryn Mawr is at a crucial point in its development and that this deserves calm and rational consideration. It will be devoting a similar amount of space to these issues in its next issue, and all the space necessary to print letters expressing ideas and viewpoints on this subject.

Dorm exchange—what is the purpose of the dorm exchange? Is it served by the different backgrounds or viewpoints of students enrolled in both Haverford and Bryn Mawr? Or is it served by the students themselves? If we support cross-majoring, it is a matter of opinion whether or not there is a dining hall in a single-sex dormitory when deciding which dormitory to go into. The need for centralized dining is inevitable, yet it has no say. How close does this come to merger and have we considered possible consequences before continuing? Or would we be guilty of unjust discrimination if we were to refuse to print items deemed offensive?

Questions and suggestions may be addressed to Shelley Keplner, 527-5683, or may be deposited in the College News box in Taylor. The newspaper is produced every other Sunday night in the Merion back smoker. Come by if you want to help us.

LETTERS

I trust that I am not alone in valuing the freedom to eat where we choose. We hear much these days about "community," but seem to forget that ours is a very small and somewhat isolated community where the need to go someplace "different" for dinner may be rarely, but then keenly, felt. Campus diversions are comparatively few, and the importance of being able to say, "Let's go to Haffen (or Erdman, or Denbigh, or Rhoads) tonight, instead," should not be underestimated. Furthermore, if (as I sincerely hope) centralized dining is inevitable, then we should not be required to consider whether or not there is a dining hall in a single-sex dormitory when deciding which dormitories will be "permanently" coed, and which single sex.

As for centralized mail delivery, do the savings which it would afford (on the cost of delivering campus mail only) justify its inconvenience?

Finally, I think it would be nice to have squash courts. It would also be nice to have, for example, a Department of History of Religion.

VISIT THE OWL

Communication With Extra-Terrestrial Intelligence, The Art of Making a Perfect Husband, and Talk to Your Plants. What do these titles have in common? They are among the thousands of interesting bargain volumes in the Bryn Mawr Alumnae Association Bookstore, the Owl.

Located in back of Haffner, the quaint 1890's building was originally the private home of Dr. Clark, from whom the college obtained the house.

In 1971, the local Alumnae Association, who had long been raising money for the District 3 (Pennsylvania, South New Jersey, Delaware) Alumnae Regional Scholarship Program through annual book sales in the gym, welcomed the opportunity of a settled bookstore and moved into and established The Owl. The Owl is managed and operated by alumnae co-chairmen Miss Frances King and Mrs. W. Nelson West and approximately 20 alumnae volunteers and has proved itself a definite financial success for the Association and the Scholarship Program. Whereas the annual book sales brought in about $5,000 a year, the Owl, which has an extremely low operating budget, has been able to contribute $20,000 annually to the Fund.

Their success is mainly due to the fact that all books are donated by alumnae and friends—and are sold at bargain-lovers' prices. They are offered for 10¢ each and brand new hardcovers for $5.00 or $6.00. Pricing at the Owl, the co-chairman explained, "is done very carefully, with the help of standard publications available for such assistance.

There is a great turnover of books, but the volumes are accumulating. There are 5,000 square feet in the Owl not covered with books, in all disciplines, topics, and languages.

From Psychology to children's literature, from the occult to engineering textbooks, the book you've been looking for is probably there. Miss King and Mrs. West commented that the most fun they have in their operation is in locating specific books for customers.

Eryn Mawr rs who view the Owl as a local phenomenon may be surprised to find out that the Owl advertises its services widely and has visitors and receives donations and orders from all over the country and from abroad.

Take advantage of the excellent bookstore. The Owl is open Tuesday and Thursday afternoons, 1:00 to 6:00 PM, and Saturday mornings 10:00 AM to 1:00 PM.

FEMINISTS' HEROINES

Who are our heroines? A sample of five poker players and some passers-by turned up a list including Kate Millet, Dolly Parton, Babs Zaharias, Queen Elisabeth I, Katharine Hepburn, Harriet Tubman, Ellie Kemper, Susan B. Anthony, Martha Graham, Indira Gandhi and Julie Andrews.

Humor and incongruity aside, the question of feminists and their heroines is an important one. Women need role models, it is said, in order to gain a sense of themselves as women and as strong, active beings, able to succeed at the endeavors they choose. At the same time sectors of the feminist movement criticize "stars" of the movement, and point out the dangers in lauding the seemingly exceptional women and ignoring the diversity of women's achievements, and the differing problems facing women of different social and economic classes.

Feminists are not always "politically correct." The person who picked Indira Gandhi said that it wasn't her recent political actions that she admired, but her overall determination and leadership of a government in a large country with serious issues confronting it. We choose them on the basis of personal interest; often they are in a field which we are knowledgeable about, or they express some particular quality that we value.

Sometimes we project our interests or theoretical viewpoint onto our heroines, sometimes (often, I believe) we are ignorant about historical figures we admire.

Heroines strengthen our resolves, show us success stories, or, if there is not a success story, make us so angry that we resolve to fight on even harder.

One problem with heroines is that they can be elitist. A recent complaint about the Women's Alliance of Carey Thomas T-shirt was that while we admire some aspects of her life, goals, and achievements, to make her into a cult figure denies her strong-willed, sometimes unjust policies.

If our heroines are famous women, then it is less likely that they will be poor or minority members. Instead we may and up celebrating only those women who were prominent in the typically masculine spheres of politics or religion, or women in the arts, a field traditionally more open to women.

It is important for women to find their history in the lives of women who are not the equivalents of male heroes. Our grandmothers, the women who developed pottery and weaving, the women who bore and raised and educated and loved children, who ran houses and worked the land, are heroines of a different sort—political, religious, and artistic figures.

Yet at the same time, it does us no harm to discover those women who were great, in their time, or whom we now see as exceptional, in art and literature especially but also, in other times and other societies in politics, religion, economics, and most importantly, in social movements.

Throughout our four years here, whenever the going gets rough, and papers loom frighteningly large, we are told to look to our alumnae for inspiration. In doing so, this column recognizes and applauds the accomplishments of these women.

For such a small college, Bryn Mawr has an exceptionally large number of alumnae with distinguished careers who have made important contributions in their fields. Representative of such alumnae are Emily Green Balch '89, 1946 Nobel Peace Prize winner and co-founder with Jane Addams and others of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom; Ume Tauda '92, founder of Tauda College, Tokyo, Japan; Margaret Ayer Barnes '07, 1930 Pulitzer Prize winner.

Marianne Moore '09, poetess and Pulitzer Prize winner; Katharine Sergeant White '14, co-founder of New Yorker magazine; Susan Brandeis Gilbert '15, the first woman lawyer to argue a case before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Katharine Burr Blodgett '17, a world authority on the optical properties of thin films, was the first woman to receive a PhD, in physics from Cambridge University; Eleanor Laning Dullies '17, economist and diplomat, before the Supreme Court of the United States.

When, as women and feminists, we have a sense of our past, of the variety of women, and of the diversities and similarities of their conditions, we have a vocabulary for discussion of our ideas, a system of examples. Sometimes we exercise conscious or unconscious revisionism, seeing in these women the qualities we aspire to, but then perhaps heroines need not be so rigorously footnoted as other Bryn Mawr endeavors. The women we chose as heroines strengthen our resolve, show us successes, or if their stories are not successes our indignation may inspire us to higher efforts.

Call for Papers

I would really like to print excerpts from and synopses of people's papers on women, and sex roles, in any and all of the disciplines. Now that exam week is over, why not share your research with other interested students? Contact Martha Kaplan, Pen West, 525-2800.
Michael Lewis's "Nachtasyl" rather dramatized that stylistic flaws are not "anecdotal" in "Forward and back... pitching the growing mind, it aims to gel" is an instance of this. Of the four serious prose pieces, Jane Sarason's "Same Time Today" is the most daring and complex, in its juxtaposition of the fantastic and surreal with the vividly ordinary. Objects in the world of the "story"—a bicycle lock, strawberries—become symbolic counters in the protagonist's developing reverie and then resume their places in an intractable physical setting, so that the protagonist, though she has withdrawn into a lonely tower, is not allowed to cut herself off from the "whole mire of things we must wade through before we can find our happiness."

All four of the stories present us with a slice from the life of a central character (Kenyatta's poem, actually, has more of a story to tell than any of them). Two of them, "Bodysisting" (a futuristic, dystopian vision of daily life at Haverford) and "Of Goons and "Ille Desk Norman" (a macabre piece that was perhaps inspired by someone's boring summer job) do not successfully solve the problem of how to end this kind of piece. It may be part of such a story's integrity that it does not have a strong denouement; a "day in the life," much like any other day, has been chosen more or less at random, they imply.

The last couple of paragraphs should nevertheless function somehow to put the typical day in perspective or bring its character more sharply into focus. If, for example, that wonderful robot-machine had been left standing on the lawn straining toward the administration building at the end of "Bodysisting"—but here I exceed the prerogative of a reviewer. There has not been room here to do justice to all the good things in this anthology; for the most part, the editors have chosen well.

"Your mad laughable wanderings" (assuming that this "you" is the "he" of the previous stanza) on other grounds? "Duncan's Many Horses" has a memorable last stanza, but the poem's mixture of vocabularies does not always work: The mixture of metaphors in "Forward and back... pitching the growing mind, it aims to gel" is an instance of this. A number of the poems catch and fix a particular incident in the subjective or social life of the speaker—a ride on the bus or the train; a glimpse through someone's window. This kind of poem is apt to remind us that we all have memories like these, which wouldn't mean anything much to anyone else: only the lyric poet can make of such a moment a significant event. The poem that most arrestingly does this is Jill Krilov's "Pictures of my Grandmother." Photographs are conventionally associated with sentimental nostalgia; this poem, however, conveys a different kind of feeling, in the face of which conventional nostalgia seems lazy or dishonest. An important cause of the poem's effectiveness is the sharpness with which photographed poses are caught in simple language; the sharper the image of this young woman, the speaker did not know, the sharper, ironically, is the sense of estrangement. "Pulenko and the Egg" is powerful in a different way; even though the poet tries to do too much of the poem's work with adjectives, so that one or two sections come off sounding over-written ("split-log table, black-nailed hand... stogie-browned thumb..., sagging breeches"), the incident itself is so arrestingly conceived and so well dramatized that stylistic flaws are not so damaging in Kenyatta's as they would have been in Krilov's poem.

Three of the poems are philosophical rather than "anecdotal." With metaphor and/or topical reference they propose to put some important aspect of experience in perspective; violence, love, growth, loss of illusion, or the price we pay to hold onto illusions. Because this kind of poem is more pretentious than the subjective anecdote, it is harder for a relatively inexperienced poet to manage successfully. Michael Lewis's "Nachtasyl" rather baffled me because I can't get the speaker's attitude toward the Charles Mansons, the Sons of Sam, to cohere: are they petty or grandly heretical? Is the speaker, the "I", one of the "we" for whom Manson has become a media idol, or does he love "your mad laughable wanderings" (assuming that this "you" is the "he" of the previous stanza) on other grounds? "Duncan's Many Horses" has a memorable last stanza, but the poem's mixture of vocabularies does not always work: The mixture of metaphors in "Forward and back... pitching the growing mind, it aims to gel" is an instance of this.

1. Only four freshmen left the College in the fall semester this year.
2. English House has a large, startlingly colored bathtub in its bathroom.
3. Dunkin' Donuts get stale after almost two hours.
4. Coke loses all the fizz in 27 minutes.
5. Dining hall potatoes generally start out bad.
"There was no possibility of taking a walk that day."

Or, otherwise:

"Aesopae leave no fossils."

Psychologists tell us that, in a long series of things, only two are apt to be remembered specifically, the first and the last. This applies to books equally well: it is in the first and the last lines that are apt to leave the biggest impression, and therefore must be the most memorable. The two above are memorable—the first from Jane Eyre, the second from Even Cowgirls Get the Blues. Aside from "In the beginning," the two most famous lines in literature have to be—can you doubt?—"Call me Ishmael" and "Gregor Samsa awoke from uneasy dreams to find..." But these are not the only notables. There is, in Joyce Carol Oates' Expensive People, a Pan Am flight to Vienna and I'd been treated again.

Joyce's The Dubliners has its own power:

"I don't murder children; as a child I murdered." Or the indefatigable, unforgettable, "Lolita, light of my life, fire of my loins." But the most memorable, bitter-sweet of all first lines has to be Daphne duMaurier's, "Last night I dreamt I went to Manderley again."

Last lines are memorable as well. Joyce's The Dubliners has its own power:

"His soul swooned as he heard the snow falling, like the descent of their last end, upon all the living and the dead."

Identifying these half-remembered lines reaches into the backwaters at things you didn't know you knew. Here is a list of easy and obscure first and last lines, with their origins below.

Answers

1. "Yes, she thought, laying down her brush, I have had my vision."
2. "And yes I said yes I will yes."
3. "He loved Big Brother."

Memos

One of the programs during International week (April 2-8) organized by the International Students' Association will be an evening of Indian music and dance—dance to the song of the poet and composer Tagore. Singers and dancers from Bryn Mawr and Haverford are needed for chorus, duet and solo parts. They should have some training in music or dance, though not necessarily Indian. (For example, Chorale or Chamber Singers or modern dancers should have no problem.) All songs and dances will be taught. Rehearsals begin next week. Students are invited to join and especially attend the first meeting, over dinner in the Denbigh Library on Monday, January 24, at 6:00 p.m. If you are interested but cannot attend the first meeting, contact Sarma Bose (Heron.)

Registration for second semester will take place this Thursday and Friday, January 25 and 26, from 9-12 and 1-5 in Thomas.

Spring Show Blooms

The Bryn Mawr-Haverford Drama Club begins production this week of its spring show, Edward Albee's Everything in the Garden. Mr. Edward Shakespeare, an English teacher at Baldwin and a member of the Haverford Board of Managers, is directing the play. Mr. Shakespeare was hired because Mr. Robert Butman, Professor of English and Performing Arts, is on sabbatical leave this semester to direct The Creatist at St. John's School in Annapolis.

Albee's play is a comedy-drama based on an earlier play by Giles Cooper. Life in the suburbs, in this version, becomes an American counterpart of Bunuel's film "Belle du Jour" (and if you know what that means, you'll come to see the play.) Performances are March 2 and 3 in Roberta Hall, Haverford.
"King of the Gypsies" steals the show

"King of the Gypsies" has been hailed - by the producers of "King of the Gypsies" as a "motion picture event." Beware of all motion picture events. The reviewer undoubtedly rates more highly than we expect our expectations were not so high. As a portrait of gypsy life, a life which has the same kind of mystical childhood appeal as the circus, the movie is well done, at times fascinating. Susan Sarandon in particular embodies the strong gypsy woman; hair caught beneath an exotic scarf, the professional fortune-teller exudes a presence of mind as she deceives a policeman after the death of her husband. Unfortunately there is not enough of this and too much wandering through the life of her gypsy son, soon to be King of the Gypsies.

If this one movie is a "motion picture event," then surely Eric Roberts, as the son, is a "film actor happening." His vigorous promotion as the next boy wonder of Hollywood contains all the elements of hype that make our expectations so unnaturally high. Roberts does a fine job: his accent even matches Susan Sarandon's, giving them an authenticity not shared by some of the cast. His character, though, is simply not overly likeable, and the camera emphasizes his good looks at the expense of the natural flow of the story. He is competent, but when we have been led to expect the next Clark Gable the only result can be disappointment. There is also the fact that Eric Roberts' character does not want to be King of the Gypsies - has not even grown up with the gypsies, and this antiathy runs counter to romantic, exotic expectations nurtured by childhood gypsy stories. Why should we like a boy who doesn't want to be King of the Gypsies?

To add insult to injury, his disinterested stems not from moral of philosophical issues, but because he wants to surf in California with his blond girlfriend. The whole issue is shared by some of the cast. His character, though, is simply not overly likeable, and the camera emphasizes his good looks at the expense of the natural flow of the story. He is competent, but when we have been led to expect the next Clark Gable the only result can be disappointment. There is also the fact that Eric Roberts' character does not want to be King of the Gypsies - has not even grown up with the gypsies, and this antiathy runs counter to romantic, exotic expectations nurtured by childhood gypsy stories. Hepburn Movie at BMC?

The Philadephia Inquirer reports that a film on M. Carey Thomas will be made on the Bryn Mawr campus, featuring Katharine Hepburn. Though the script is in the making, there is some question of funding, and official sources refuse to confirm the report.

Some men say, "Let me make a lot of money, then I will turn to higher things." I have known many such men, and they never lived long enough to turn to higher things, although some of them lived very long.

Sports Weekend

For the second year in a row, the Bryn Mawr Athletes from the four winter sports (badminton, basketball, gymnastics and swimming) returned early for the Sports Weekend. Scrimmages were two days of concentrated practice that not only allows the athletes to recover from the inactivity of vacation but also gives the athletes of each sport a chance to meet others outside their sport and see what the others do.

Each sport had two practices each day and two strategy sessions over the weekend. In addition to this rigorous schedule, a work schedule was set up for meals so that each team helped in either the setting up or clean up of at least one meal. These practices gave all the athletes a head start on getting back into shape for their seasons this winter. As one student athlete said, "I think it really helped everyone to get in shape, mentally as well as physically."

The weekend was not all practice, though. Saturday night Mrs. Shillingford and Mrs. Castner reported to the athletes on their trip to AIA's delegate Assembly in California during the beginning of the year. Then the second annual obstacle course was run, with a lot of bumps and bruises and one dislocated shoulder. Gymnast Ann Korm took first place honors and was joined by three other team members in the top six places.

The coaches see the weekend as "very worthwhile" and agree that it helps prepare the athletes for their upcoming seasons. One advantage of the weekend, according to basketball coach Jen Shillingford, is that "nobody has to worry about anything except sports," a rare occurrence at Bryn Mawr. Also to the coaches' credit was the fact that the weekend stayed within its financial budget.

Each of the teams will be testing the success of seeking in upcoming games. Badminton opens their season at Harcum on Jan. 30 at 4:00 PM. Basketball plays Our Lady of Angels away on Jan. 27 at 7:00 PM and Feb. 1 they travel to Cabrini. Gymnastics faces Essex Community College at home Jan. 26 at 5:00 PM and travels the following day to Malvern to compete in the PAIA Championships at the Pancotts Gym, and meets U. of Penn and Ursinus at home on Feb. 2. Swimming continues their season on Jan. 23 at home against Widener at 5:00 PM, away at U. of Penn on Jan. 27, at Temple on Feb. 1, and again at home against Inmaculata on Feb. 6.

GYMNASTICS TEAM IN CHAMPIONSHIPS

The gymnastics team faced its first opponents on Dec. 12 and was defeated by both West Chester and Ursinus. A young and inexperienced team, the coaches Laura Blumer ('80) working floor, bars and beams, and Ellen Bonacarta ('79) on bars, vault and floor, are the only returning members from last year's squad. They are aided by six new members: Puff Alstatt ('82) working vault and bars; Debbie Brown ('82) competing bars and beam, Judy Calhoun ('82) going all-around, Naomi Fishlow ('82) on floor and bars. Ann Korn ('82) competing floor, bars, and vault; and Naoko Nakazawa ('82) on vault and beam. Despite the inexperience and youth of the team, they are a stronger team than in past years, with more depth, back-up and the ability to meet others outside their sport and see what the others do.

The loss to West Chester and Ursinus was not unexpected due to the strength of both these teams and the meet's place so early in the season. One unfortunate event marred the meet for the Bryn Mawr's as well as for both other teams, the breaking of the uneven bars. This event looks to be a strong one for the team and they were disappointed at not being able to find out just how strong it will be. They will have that opportunity on Friday, Jan. 26 when at 5:00 PM they meet Essex Community College at home, as well as the following day when they travel to Malvern, PA to compete in the PAIA Championships.

BASKETBALL SHOWS PROMISE

The basketball team has been busy both before and after vacation. They met our neighbor Harcum in a scrimmage on the last day of classes last semester and Rider College last Friday, as well as returning early for the Sports weekend. Both scrimmages resulted in losses for the Hawters, with a 10-point spread against Harcum and a 40-point spread against Rider. Both games are designed to allow both teams to test different tactics against their opponents and do not necessarily reflect the true ability of the teams. Rider is an extremely strong team with several members on scholarship, and shot 70%--75% in the first half of the game, demonstrating their great ability. Bryn Mawr Coach Shillingford expects that "they will probably win their division," and that "they are the strongest team we play."

The Bryn Mawr team showed several very strong points; improvement in a number of skills, some depth in substitute varsity, and strong team spirit. According to Coach Shillingford, against Rider "they played well and kept on playing." She is very pleased with the team, saying she has not "seen this much depth or spirit before." The team is looking forward to a strong season.
Last semester the Honor Board brought up the issue of record keeping for academic violations. In a letter to the News we discussed its implications. However, the questions we raised were never sufficiently dealt with by the community. There weren't meetings in all the dormitories and we feel that an issue such as this needs to be discussed. What follows is a copy of the letter that appeared.

"It may surprise some members of the bi-College community to know that Bryn Mawr's Honor Board keeps no records of the students involved in academic cases. Because of the Honor Board's commitment to confidentiality, we presently rely on the memories of deans, Honor Board members, and the students themselves to recall the names of individuals involved in previous academic violations. We do keep files of the ghost cases printed in The News; however, no names are recorded. This method raises several ethical questions that are of great concern to the Honor Board.

Specifically, the deans have expressed concern that a student, having been involved in an Honor Board case, could apply to be nominated by the college for a national fellowship, which has as one of its requirements personal integrity. The question is not whether a past Honor Code infraction discredits a student, for in fact the Honor Board believes that turning yourself in for an infraction of the Code indicates a strong sense of honor and responsibility for your actions. The question is, should the college recommend a candidate for a fellowship without complete knowledge of her academic history? Moreover, can we depend on the individual candidate to make this information available to the fellowship committee?

The problem we face is whether the Honor Board should keep written records of academic cases. At present ghost cases are used both to educate the community and to provide guidelines for future cases. They could be compiled statistically to determine the number of cases and types of violations, thus demonstrating the viability of the Code.

Do particular courses seem to pressure students into cheating? Are take-home exams too much of a temptation? At present we have no answers to these questions. We also question whether or not repeat offenders should be judged more severely than first offenders. If there are no records, we would not be able to tell who has been involved in an academic case before, except by the memories of the deans, faculty members of the Honor Board or the student members.

For example, a recent case involved a Bryn Mawr graduate who returned after several years to bring herself before the Honor Board for a number of infractions incurred while at Bryn Mawr. The Honor Board decided that she could no longer ask Bryn Mawr College for recommendations and should she do so, The College would then be obligated to disclose the details of the case. In this instance it became necessary for a written record to be kept in order to ensure that the decision of the Board was carried out. Another example: in the extreme case of a student who had been expelled from Bryn Mawr, there could be legal ramifications if the student chose to sue the college, claiming that she had been denied due process. The college would have no records with which to form a defense.

Institution a record-keeping system would allieve the problems listed above. But the Honor Board also feels that there are several disadvantages to having such a system. Primarily the Honor Board is concerned as to whether written records violate the spirit of the Code. After all, any student who has violated the Code and been allowed to remain at Bryn Mawr should be trusted so that we do not expect another infraction. Further, instituting a new policy may discourage people from turning themselves in.

Finally, if files were to be kept, what should their format be? Should we maintain our present system, i.e., a file of ghost cases? Or should we add the name of the student involved to a description of the case which would be destroyed after the student involved graduated? Or finally, should we keep a file with the aforementioned characteristics in the Office of the Undergraduate Dean, so that no student would have access to the information it contained? These are questions that need to be answered.

At Plenary on January 28, 1979, the Honor Board will be asking the community must decide among the following actions 1. To commit themselves to the existing system. 2. To accept one of the record-keeping systems suggested here. or 3. To propose an alternative solution.

We ask you to give serious consideration to this question and be ready to discuss the pros and cons of an issue that involves the entire community. We cannot make the decision on such an issue. We need your help.
